Milan is the heart of Italian fashion, design and finance, the gateway to Italy's industrial north. However, in recent years the city has lost some of its luster and organizational flair. Anyone who has not visited Milan for several years will notice the difference; there is now a weary air about the city, instead of the bustling confidence of even a decade ago.

The traffic is just as in all of Italy's capital cities. However public transport within the city of Milan is excellent, thanks to the efficient metro and bus services. There are few parks and sports facilities, perhaps because the Alps and the Italian lakes, with their winter and water sports, are only a short drive away. The choice of facilities for English-speaking expatriates is good with four international schools, two English-speaking churches (one Roman Catholic and one Anglican) and two bookshops. However, most north Europeans will feel more at home in Milan than in Rome. The city is within an easy drive of France, Switzerland, Austria and Germany and the history and efficiency of its neighbors is reflected in the way Milan goes about its business.
